

In this society, international trade has become an integral part of the country's economic source. But how is international trade formed? It can be traced back to the Great Geographical Discovery. From fifteen centuries to seventeen centuries, the European countries began to look for new trade routes and trade partners in order to develop nascent capitalism. During their exploration, they had discovered many countries and regions that were unknown to Europeans at that time. The most well-known example is Columbus' discovery of the New World. Initially, Columbus embarked on a voyage under the orders of Portuguese royal family - to find India, the country that produces spices. Columbus thought he found India, but after his death, everyone knew that the region is America, not India. The Great Geographical Discovery not only increased the connection between East and West in culture and trade, but also expanded Western civilization to all parts of the world. While bringing these advantages, there are also some problems appeared. For instance, imperialism, colonialism and disease. The Great Geographical Discovery has become a major change in the century. Without it, there would be no international trade today. Although it cause a large number of deaths of native people who were born and raised in America, it had a major impact on future generations.
